Mold Damage Restoration

Mold on books, papers, inside wall cavities, ceiling tiles and other building contents and personnel complaining of runny noses, itchy eyes and sore throats— this scenario is becoming all too common today. Microbial contamination is rampant in many buildings for many reasons, including new energy saving programs that require air-conditioning to be turned off on weekends, holidays and other times the building is not occupied.

The spores of fungi are always present in the air and on objects. They lie dormant, waiting for the perfect conditions of high humidity and warm temperatures to grow. Once growth begins, it spreads quickly, devouring everything in its path and using the item it is growing on as a food source. Since microbial growth is exponential, quick response is imperative to control the menace. Dehumidification is effective in arresting the growth, but the active growth and spores must be removed, and the cause of the outbreak identified and corrected.
